Rachel Sumner is pursuing her PhD in Human Development at Cornell University. She is interested in conducting research on gender and racial achievement gaps in education and ways in which those disparities can be eliminated. Her previous work includes looking at the positive and negative effects that role models can have on academic performance. She is currently working on a study aimed at exploring gender-driven differences in the hiring process.