Will DeFraine is currently a Ph.D. student in Human Development. His primary line of research examines the interplay of emotions and executive functioning (viz., working memory), using both behavioral and cognitive neuroscience methods. His work in the CIWS seeks to understand how undergraduate students make career choices, and to what extent there are gender differences in their career choices as well as in the factors involved in those decisions. To understand these differences, he employs both quantitative and qualitative measures.